

Interested in Helping Wildlife?

Learn About Wildlife Rehabilitation

This inset box is available for the distributing organization (local rehabilitator or rehabilitation facility, state rehabilitation association, state wildlife agency, etc.) to provide their own message, information, and contact numbers.

Information can be placed in this area prior to printing or photocopying. For an electronic version of this brochure, contact IWRC or WildAgain Wildlife Rehabilitation, or visit their websites.

Affix
here
postage

Help Us Help Wildlife.

developed by

The Wildlife Rehabilitator Recruiting Project

endorsed by

National WILDLIFE REHABILITATORS
Association

International Wildlife
Rehabilitation Council

© 2001, WildAgain Wildlife Rehabilitation, Inc.
Illustrations by Jennifer Goyette.
All Rights Reserved.

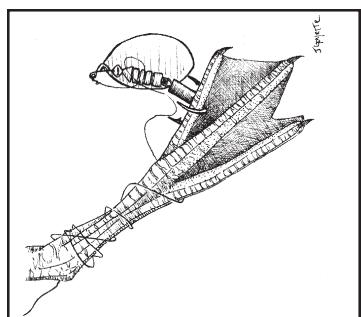

Permission to reproduce or copy is freely given provided the brochure is used in its original form, in its entirety and with no alterations or changes, except user insertion of information in the box directly above. The illustrations may not be used for any other purpose or altered in any manner.

Illustrations were funded by the International Wildlife Rehabilitation Council and National Wildlife Rehabilitators Association.

Wildlife in Need

A cardinal lies limp on the ground after hitting a window. A young cottontail rabbit is injured by a lawnmower. A snapping turtle is hit by a car. A fledgling robin has punctures from a cat attack. A red-tailed hawk is caught in a barbed wire fence. The home of some juvenile red foxes is destroyed by road work.

When people find wild animals whose lives are threatened, especially when human actions have been the direct or indirect cause, they often want to help. Yet helping these wild creatures recover and releasing them back to their natural wild habitat requires more than compassion. Caring for wildlife is very different from caring for domestic animals and may be much more difficult than initially expected. This is where wildlife rehabilitators come in.

Need for More Wildlife Rehabilitators

The number of wild animals in need is growing annually as humans move into and damage wildlife habitat. In most cases, when humans and wildlife collide, wildlife suffers. Increasingly, people seek help for these wild animals from wildlife rehabilitators. As a result, there is a growing need for more wildlife rehabilitators.

Most wildlife rehabilitators perform their rehabilitation activities on their own property, including the house and yard. These home-based rehabilitators volunteer their time, energy, and resources (supplies, space, and money). They must have or arrange for separate indoor and outdoor facilities for wildlife caging away from people and pets. They arrange for veterinary services. They obtain the relevant permits or licenses (state, provincial, and sometimes federal).

Rehabilitating wildlife is a demanding activity. It requires considerable time, potentially ranging from one hour to several hours per day, possibly around the clock, including weekends and holidays. Wildlife rehabilitation also involves performing a wide variety of tasks: answering phone calls about human-wildlife conflicts, preparing special diets, feeding orphaned wild animals, administering medical treatments, cleaning and building cages, and finding release sites.

While many of the tasks are personally performed by the rehabilitators, some may be performed by volunteers. The tasks can be physically, mentally, and emotionally challenging. Some larger wildlife rehabilitation facilities also recruit volunteers for specific assignments. Many of the tasks are similar to those for home-based rehabilitators, but may also include conducting educational programs or providing administrative help.

Realities

People may be attracted to wildlife rehabilitation because it sounds rewarding, exciting, and enjoyable. It can be all of those things. However, it is difficult, stressful, tiring, and frustrating. It is not easy, nor is it a hobby. It takes a considerable commitment of time and energy, as well as a willingness to provide high quality care to wildlife in need. Wildlife rehabilitation also takes money... and the government doesn't pay. Rehabilitation is not about "cuddling wildlife" or keeping wildlife as pets but keeping wild animals wild. It's about releasing those wild animals that can recover. It is recognizing that some wild animals die or must be euthanized. It is, overall, the joy of seeing an animal return to its natural habitat, healthy and wild again.

Want To Learn More?

A more complete booklet called "Wildlife Rehabilitation: Is It For You?" is available. It provides more details of the tasks involved in wildlife rehabilitation, requirements, and ways to get started. A copy of this brochure and the booklet are available from:

- International Wildlife Rehabilitation Council (IWRC); P.O. Box 8187, San Jose, CA 95155; 408-271-2685; assistant@iwrc-online.org; or www.iwrc-online.org.

- WildAgain Wildlife Rehabilitation; 29319 Northstar Lane, Evergreen, CO 80439; fax 303-670-8938; recruiting@ewildagain.org or www.Ewildagain.org.

Information may also be available from state, provincial, and federal wildlife agencies.

